Dales Station is nestled in the heart of lush valley at 650 ft. el. on the approach to Mount Lassen Volcanic National Park. The natural beauty of this riparian landscape is home to a large variety of wildlife, large and small. Bald eagles, egrets and heron, duck, doves, quail, turkey, woodpeckers, vultures, and many other birds travel through Dales daily. The Paynes Creek behind Dales Station flows year round and spawns trout, salmon, smallmouth bass, sacramento suckers, squawfish, and more species of fish. Fox, coyote, raccoon, skunk, and large numbers of deer have called this area home for millennia. The majestic cottonwood trees and live oak trees towering above Dales Station provide a home and nourishment for many of the local fauna and are a vital part of the local ecosystem. While the landscape of Dales is lush, it is a volcanic terrain, covered with lava boulders, lava beds, volcanic buttes, and climbing hills filled with springs. Dales is on the climb from the northeastern tip of California's Central Valley to the mountainous region where the Sierra Nevada meets the actively volcanic Cascade Mountains. Prior to Mt. St. Helens, Mount Lassen was the last volcano to erupt in the United States in 1914 continuing for over 2 years. We hope you enjoy the natural wonders surrounding Dales Station!
